

The Loire valley is one of France's most interesting and diverse viticultural regions. And while it is home to almost every type and style of wine imaginable, including dry reds, sweet whites and sparklers, it is perhaps best known for the dry and fresh, grassy whites made from its sauvignon blanc grape. Vineyards of this variety are mainly grown in and around the town of Pouilly-sur-Loire, where the famous appellations of Sancerre and Pouilly Fumé are located.

The terrain and soils of this area are quite diverse, with substantial geological differences often appearing within the same vineyard or district. For this reason, producers have developed the practice of producing wines from individual plots, each intended to express the unique mineral composition of where it was grown.....
